German Theological Seminary.

The tenth annual Commencement Exercises of the Seminary were held in Westminster Church on Wednesday evening The programme began with prayer and music, followed by an earnest, thoughtful, and well-delivered address by Mr. Arnold W. Fismer on the "Dignity of Woman Redeemed by Christianity."

The Rev. Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler, of Brooklyn, then delivered an address upon The Christian Orator. He spoke, he said, rather to Americans than to Germans, although he wished to be understood as expressing the friendliest interest in this institution.

That discourse is the best which achieves the best result and draws the largest number to hear and to follow the message the preacher brings. Spiritual success is the ultimate test of all pulpit labor. Napoleon at Marengo was a law to himself, and justified his ideas. The pulpit should conform itself to the law of means to ends. Fools may criticise, but fools never blundered into Austerlitz. Chalmers, when he could point to British peers weeping before him, and even to Canning's praise, sufficiently answered his critics. So should the pulpit orator aim at natural and effective eloquence. Nature is the ultimate standard, and the instinct of the great human heart is the true criterion of the best orator, poet, artist, or statesman. Pulpit charletans and pyrotechnists shine brightly against the darkness of their audience. But men steer not by comets but fixed stars. They steer by Dordrecht and Westminster. By-and-by they will perhaps steer by this young institution, now in the gristle and soon to be in the bone. Insincerity cannot stand long against this popular instinct. The popular heart makes few mistakes in the long run. To be true to nature before a living auditory in an argument made red hot by an earnest heart is to be most powerful. The preacher is then like an oracle of the living God. No young man attains this by accident. Chance gains no eminence, for occasions come alike to fools and to geniuses. One masters the occasion, the other is smothered beneath it.

A young man must understand himself. No man ever made a good figure who mistook his forte. He must be—and he will be—himself. To strain and strive to imitate another person is to be neither the man that God made nor the other man he tries to become. Let Emmons and Guthrie practice to their own audiences—logical or imaginative as the case may be. Spurgeon's power lies in his courageous fidelity to nature, and in his great, warm heart. To be thoroughly natural requires courage. We shrink from being superior to artificiality. To stiffen the elbows and starch the speech and be formal is not to be effective. Stand up in your own shoes and speak out! It is the first great step towards effectiveness.

Laborious apprenticeship is, however, required. Labor infinitus et quotidiana meditatio is the rule. Cicero, Pitt, Charles James Fox—these men, after repeated effort, attained victory. It was specially true of the elder Tyng. He failed as an extempore speaker, with the President of the United States in his audience, and his final success grew out of his determination not to be conquered. So with Dr. Storrs. But one must know how to speak. Patient labor gets its reward. To be natural is not to be uncouth. But it needs careful discipline. The lack of energy is a fatal defect in any sermon. Therefore get energy. All true men love it.

Energy hides a multitude of pulpit sins, but a lack of it will permit an audience to join the seven sleepers under the most ingenious disquisition. Energy may be seen in the bated breath as in the loud utterance. Silence even is at times powerful.

Then a man can cut loose from his musty parchments His boundless circumference of range is the golden moment of heavenly anticipation. The whole machinery plays with smoothness and perfect ease as one revels in the delight of speech.

Then the happy adjectives step out to be wedded to the waiting substantives—the very word flies in at the window of the mind at the very moment.

The speaker quoted from Summerfield's MS. to show that he and Robert Hall held the same view, and proved it by the story of Robert Hall's use of pierce instead of penetrate in his great apostrophe. There is a sense in which extempore oratory is extrumpery oratory but the greatest effect is possible on that line. You may have this power from on high, if you will go after it.

The great two-fold rule is, "Feel everything, fear nothing." We want not less logic or exegesis, but we need holy emotion. The secret is here [and the speaker laid his hand on his breast], and frigidity is never eloquent. Let no critic shame you out of your heart. Win your people that you may win them for your Saviour. Give pathos full play; it is doubtful if one without this quality has a call to the ministry. If you break down in tears—then break down. More may be achieved by it than by restraint. Dr. McCosh said Chalmers was eloquent, but Alexander Duff appealing for missions was the most moving orator he ever heard. One man only after an hour held out against the speech, but the last ten minutes was before a great mass of bowed heads and streaming eyes. Everybody bent before that magnetic eloquence.

Eloquence is "truth in earnest," or the mind's best thoughts at the mind's best moments. A great head is not positively essential, but a great heart ever must be. Nothing will so arouse this as the love for the souls of dying men. The love of Christ is the core of your whole work. For such inspired preaching the speaker pleaded. There is a silly contempt for emotionalism. The pulpit need not lower as a soulless sphinx in a desert of aridity. Daniel Webster read the jury through and through in the Crowninshield case. Is the lawyer then too earnest in cases involving life?

The audience that listens to a four hours' plea for a criminal will go off into an orthodox sleep over half an hour of dry discourse. The lawyer brings the abstractions of law into real life; the preacher sometimes brings real life into mere abstraction. Nurture your souls where John Milton fed. Live among the scenes that inspired Bunyan and Jeremy Taylor. Open your soul to David and to Job, to Paul and John. The Bible is the model of models, for it is always true to life.

Keep your heart constantly in contact with God's inexhaustible word. You will never lower the dignity of the pulpit by imparting to it God's word and human nature. Would that this might be the range of every pulpit orbit! Why should any preacher be narrower than the word of God? You should be the private chaplain of every soul in your parish. Before the pulpit men should learn the higher law of right and truth. Statesmen and merchants alike should be instructed by it. Let nobody in your church build so high but you shall build above him. Let no one detect in you either looseness or pliancy. Let no poor wretch be destitute of your pity. Every pulpit is ideal until you make it actual; put before you a high ideal and climb on your knees to attain it It is above the platform, above the supreme bench, above the President's chair.

It matters not in what tongue you speak, there is a pulpit for Christ waiting for you. Leave self under the lowest step of the stairway. Before you are the footsteps of the eloquent of all ages and of Him whose shoe's latchet John was unworthy to unloose. "Feel everything, fear nothing." Fling out above you the snow-white banner of the truth. Hold it aloft until the frost that never melts is on your brow. Hold it aloft until the last hour strikes, and when you fall let it be with that banner around you.

Dr. Cuyler was followed by an address in German from Mr. Emil Arnold Meury, of Brooklyn, who with Mr. Fisner graduates this year. These gentlemen received their diplomas, and the exercises closed with music and the benediction. Prof. Pederit's management of the organ was greatly enjoyed, and the Messrs. Fuss sang admirably well.

The Church of God—Her Safety.

The Church of God has often been in a low, languishing, and, to all human appearance, in a desperate condition; yet one thing, as Solomon says, is set against another, and it has been at such times that His people have realized most fully the comforts of His providence and gracious presence. These stars shine brightest in dark winter nights. There was a time, for example, when the Church was reduced to the small number of eight persons; and these eight in imminent danger of perishing. If one plank of the ark had started; if some gigantic billow, striking broadside on, had swept her against the rugged summit of a mountain-top lying like a reef before the flood; if any one of the hundred accidents that are daily wrecking other ships had happened to this that sailed a shoreless sea without crew, or helm, or helmsman; to so low a pitch was the Church of God reduced, that the wreck of one ship, had been her ruin—the whole race of men perished.

It is astonishing and refreshing to look back on the way God has often extricated His people when they seemed hemmed in by destruction and without a chance of escape; and more still, to see how Haman swung on the gallows which he raised for Mordecai; how the persecutors of the three Hebrew children were consumed in the flames they had kindled for them, and how the Red Sea, into which the Egyptians would have driven God's people, became, not the grave of the oppressed, but of their oppressors. Thus in the days of old, God made the wrath of man and of devils also to praise Him. He does so still. The trials and temptations to which he leaves his saints exposed shall be but the storm that flashes and thunders and roars through the air, to leave it fresher and purer than before.—Guthrie.

WEST INDIANS have a curious test for determining whether a person has negro blood in his veins. It is called the nose test. The negro has no division in the gristle or cartilaginous substance of his nose, such as all of our pure whites can feel at its tip with the end of the finger. This is the last thing to yield to the white accession. Any negro blood is marked with a nose, the gristle of which is undivided, and the object of putting this paragraph in is, says the Boston Journal, to prove that no person will read it through without touching the finger to the nose. And few people after they have done it can tell whether they are white or black.

BASELY libeled: "Reach me down that Webster, Pat," said one of our lately elected judges to his clerk. "One of thim thaiving newspapers has been libeling me, and, be jabers, I won't stand it. The thaiving blackguard calls me a forensic light."

THERE are as many as a hundred poems by William Cullen Bryant which have never been published, among them being thirty hymns. These all are in the new edition of Mr. Bryant's works, edited with notes by Mr. Parke Godwin.
